"In Such Good Company," by Carol Burnett, is the legendary comedienne’s look back at her variety show, which ran for eleven years, from 1967-1978. Burnett enjoyed singing, dancing, performing sketch comedy (her movie parodies were often laugh-out-loud funny), and cavorting with such guest stars as Bernadette Peters, Rock Hudson, Bing Crosby, and Lucille Ball. Burnett gives high praise to her ex-husband/producer, Joe Hamilton, her cast, crew, costume designer, choreographer, writers, and others who made it possible to create 276 hour-long shows. Remarkably, she informs us, "We could tape our entire show [before a live audience], with all the sketches, musical numbers, scenery, and costume changes, plus special effects, in less than two hours." She adds, "We did very few retakes because I wanted our show to have a spontaneous feel." Baby boomers will fondly recall settling down to a night of merriment and music with Carol Burnett. The author chats with us like a close friend sitting in our living rooms, recapping her favorite segments, bemoaning bits that flopped, and regaling us with numerous behind-the-scenes anecdotes. In addition, she discusses her cast of regulars (Korman, Conway, Waggoner, and Lawrence), with whom she performed zany sketches and stunts. Carol describes what it was like to portray such iconic and off-the-wall characters as Zelda, Eunice, "Mildred Fierce," and Starlett O'Hara in "Went with the Wind." Readers will admire Burnett self-deprecating humor, passion for her work, and affection for her colleagues. Unfortunately, she reprises too many segments from her shows, at times quoting the scripts word-for-word.
